For Native Studies courses on economic development and issues in Aboriginal business.

Aboriginal peoples in Canada and Indigenous peoples around the world are becoming increasingly active in economic development activities. To find a place in the new global economy, competitive business venture creations are emerging at the regional, national, and international level. This book explores economic development in order to achieve a greater understanding of this process. Throughout the book, Anderson examines the objectives, strategies, structures, and activities of the Aboriginal peoples in Canada with the following four goals:

- to identify the emerging approach to development
- to build models of development that offer new insight
- to investigate economic development activities in order to determine if they are consistent with the models
- to examine actual development outcomes to determine if they met the expectations, and to examine whether they have been proven to be effective
